MADE HOMES

Environmental concerns are on everyone's mind these days as we all should be thinking about how we can reduce our usage of energy and also reduce waste for the long-term future of the planet. These environmental concerns extend into the new home construction market where progressive builders are adding more energy-efficient features into their new home projects. A perfect example of this on our local home construction scene is Taylor Made Homes, Greater Sudbury's only new home contractor that is registered as an R-2000 builder. Simply put, R-

Taylor Made Homes, a division of Pat Taylor Contracting, is owned by Pat and Betty Taylor.

2000 homes are the most energy-efficient and environmentally responsible new homes on the market as they are built to demanding standards for energy efficiency and indoor air quality that far surpass others in the marketplace.

Taylor Made Homes, a division of Pat Taylor Contracting, is owned by Pat and Betty Taylor and the company has been involved in nearly forty new home projects that have focussed on providing homeowners with a higher level of energy efficiency. According to Dale Taylor the construction supervisor at Taylor Made Homes, R-2000 building techniques involve superior energy-savings and insulating techniques starting from the foundation which is insulated with poured concrete encased by styrofoam panels on all exterior walls. R-2000 homes also carry a higher standard for windows, doors and offer a better airtight seal. Combined with a proper air exchanger and high efficiency heating and cooling system an R-2000 built home provides the homeowner with lower energy usage, reducing energy bills and lightening the load on the environment.

Taylor Made Homes employs nearly twenty certified local tradespeople during the peak summer building season. The company also provides complete design and construction services from excavation through to the final inspection with their new home customers. As a member of The Sudbury & District Home Builders' Association for the past six years, Taylor Made Homes is proud to be a part of an organization that promotes such a high standard of excellence amongst its members.
